Artist Statement

'Pile of Bones' was the original name of what is now the capital city of Saskatchewan, the Canadian province I grew up in. It was so named for the huge piles of buffalo bones that were stacked high on the site. Later, Pile of Bones was thought to be an odd name for a town so it was given the 'regal' name Regina.

Pile of Bones examines nurture, darkness, suppression, and desire. From the quietest embryonic origins, the work gradually intensifies towards a pulsing, rapturous end. All elements - sonic, visual and physical - amplify over time.

The work follows a logic that is emotional rather than linear. There is rupture and disquiet as the four dancers travel together through an unpredictable landscape. Bodies are encrusted in fluttering armour and caught in sticky webs. Inner demons and angels have influence over their actions. The piles of bones are reliant on each other but also rail against that dependence. Bodies twitch, melt and writhe in dream-like scenarios.

Birth and rebirth and birth again, new selves constantly emerge. These precarious selves undulate through states, through stability and instability, move as if they're learning how to walk again. New micro societies are built and demolished, new rules and rituals to observe, new ways to fail and succeed.

Animal-like, the performers herd, protect and attack. They are attracted and they are repelled. Are they human? Animal? Robots? Are they from the past or the future? Pile of Bones attempts to shine a light on the absurdity and deep pleasure of human existence and the drive to create, produce, consume. To what end?

We are all walking piles of bones, destined for the same place.
